Boston is a romantic city in Massachusetts with trees everywhere, like in Melbourne Australia. The green foliage can cool down the city on any hot summer days. Besides, it also absorbs pollution and filters the air, and that is a good thing, isn't it? Timber buildings here are common, to accommodate to the cold weather in winter months. The contrast of the exterior wall cladding on the roof top of these old buildings to the brick works has added charm and accentuated a European style.

From Boston to New York City is from 5 – 6 hours drive. And how does it look like a New York City skyline? Well, from the ferry to The Liberty Statue, the New York skyline seems to look like a man-made floating port filled with concrete and glass skyscrapers of different shapes, and these structures are visible from the far opposite end right to the edge of river.

People said Frank Sinatra has put New York City on the map. Well not exactly true, but that song is known to many people around the world. It is indeed a bustling city with crowded visitors of all background and nationality, who come to see, and experience a city that never sleeps, and for a glimpse of Wall Street, the global financial hub where millionaires and billionaires are born. And who knows...you could be on the A-list too.

Walking is the best way to explore this great city. The intricate architecture of old buildings that stands out from the crowded modern tall structures is the jewel of the Apple City. In addition, green foliage of trees on the road and top buildings soften the landscape and indirectly reduce the Heat Island Effect. [see research page for the heat Island Effect]

The past and present have come together to celebrate the spirit of civilization, and there standing tall once again, the new World Trade Centre [picture below]. And it was told, the Centre will be opened for business sometimes soon. The silvery and grey tone of the glass exterior reflects the sun-rays and merges the slender lines to the surroundings in a calm and quiet note.
